

Residential Security Monitoring Markets -- Impact Analysis Growth from National and Regional Providers

LEXINGTON, Massachusetts (February 10, 2016) – WinterGreen Research announces that it has published a new Impact study Residential Security Monitoring Recurring Revenue Market Share Analysis: Market Shares, Analysis, and Index, US, 2006 to Current, Quarterly. The 2016 study, in Excel file format, has 10 Excel worksheets to provide market share revenue, forecast, graphical presentation of the data, raw data, and strengths of challenges of each company profiled. The excel documents are flat files allowing the data to be used as desired by the client. A short power point of the information is also provided.

Market growth is likely to come from regions of with increasing disparity in property values in close proximity, and from improvements in sensor technology, especially biometrics. Market consolidation is sure to occur due to the segmented market and large number of market participants. New entrants are also expected to fare well due to competitive advantage of emerging technologies.

According to Susan Eustis, lead author of the study, “People treasure residential home security in a way that is unremarkable in its universality, and remarkable in how hard it is to achieve. Evolving technologies and services excellence mark the shifts occurring in the market. Regional and national market participants can be understood in the context of vendor strengths and weaknesses and in terms of monthly revenue analysis in the form of an index tracking of the market.”

The worldwide market for residential security monitoring recurring revenue is $11 billion anticipated to reach $22.5 billion by 2022.
